

A Mean World Needs Kindness

...by Jackson Mitchell

This is a mean world that we live in, and we need to be more kind to one another. This week I set out to do at least one act of kindness each day this week, and I think I accomplished a lot.

A few weeks ago this little old lady that lives down the street got really sick. She is one of the nicest people I ever met. She goes to me church and, every Sunday she gives out hugs to everyone. She is in the hospital, and I wrote here a get well soon card. I think that the card will make her day. Hopefully she gets better so we can get more hugs at church. A few days ago my mom got a call and it was the little old lady. She was in tears, and calling to thank me for the card. It made me feel good that I made her so happy.

This week I learned that there were kids in Virginia Beach that don't get any food in on the weekends. My mom told me that these kids go home on Friday not knowing what if they are going to have any food to eat on the weekend. My mom went to the store, and bought a ton of food for the kids. We spread it all out on the dining room table, and started an assembly line.

The bags started to pile up with all sorts of food. Then I loaded into the car, and my mom drove it to the food drive. I felt great that I help these kids.

There are mean people that need kindness in their lives. I had a great time helping people this week, and I look forward to continuing being more kind to everyone.
